

Book Club Discussion Kit - The Blade of Milan by Warren R. Basla

Dear Book Club Member,

Thank you for adding my debut novel to your group's most-likely-stacked 'to read' list. Having thoughtful fans of the genre read my work is a thrilling experience in a way that is difficult to put into words. As all writers do, I've spent countless hours in my setting, talking with my characters, considering plot points and trading time in the 'real world' for time at my desk. Knowing you are having an engaged dialogue about The Blade of Milan with your peers is an honor. I hope you enjoyed it. Please stay in touch.

Sincerest wishes,

Warren R. Basla

- Assassin's Creed, Renaissance by Oliver Bowden
- Nicked by M.T. Anderson
- A Travel Guide to the Middle Ages by Anthony Bale
- Heart of Europe by Peter H. Wilson

Behind the Scenes

- Warren's great grandfather, Francesco Pietro Basla, was born in Sizzano, Italy. In May 1914, as a young man, he traveled through the port of Genoa bound for New York City. He intended to settle in Rochester, but ended up in Syracuse, the city where Warren was born.
- While Rebecca Guarna in The Blade of Milan is fictional, there was a real Rebecca in history. She was known as a 'lady of Salerno', an early physician and surgeon who studied at the University of Salerno. Rebecca pays homage to this remarkable woman in terms of the persistence and dedication she demonstrated to overcome adversity and societal expectations of her time. There are also elements of the author at 23—arrogant, impatient—and shades of the strong women mentors in his life that have shaded Rebecca's character.
- Similarly, Rustichello da Pisa was real. He was a medieval writer imprisoned in Genoa with Marco Polo. Rustichello is credited with recording Marco's travels, specifically his time serving Kublai Khan's court. The narrative required a foil to Rebecca's character arc; Rustichello felt larger-than-life. Anyway, who better to string compelling arguments and twisty deception together than a writer!
